

Vox Populi

A curated webspace for Poetry, Politics, and Nature with over 20,000 daily subscribers and over 8,000 archived posts.

John Guzlowski: Two poems about my mother

Cattle Train to Magdeburg

My mother still remembers

The long train to Magdeburg the box cars
bleached gray
by Baltic winters

The rivers and the cities
she had never seen before and would never see again:
the sacred Vistula
the smoke haunted ruins of Warsaw
the Warta, where horse flesh met steel and fell

The leather fists of pale boys
boys her own age
perhaps seventeen
perhaps nineteen but different convinced of their godhood
by the cross they wore different from the one she knew in Lvov

The long twilight journey to Magdeburg —
four days that became six years six years that became sixty

And always a train of box cars bleached to Baltic gray.

~~

How Her Mother and Sister Died

Sometimes, my mother says, her home
West of Lvov comes back to her in dreams
That open in grayness with the sounds
Of a young, flowered girl in white
Singing a prayer of first communion,
The dirt streets around the church pure
With priests and girls and boys.

The singing prayer leads her to the grave
Where her mother and her sister Genja
And her sister's baby daughter lie,
The marshy graves where the hungry men Dropped them after shooting them
And cutting them in secret places.

My mother says, these men from the east
Were like buffaloes: terrible and big.

She waves the dreams away with her hand
And starts again, talking of plowing the fields
Of cutting winter wood, of that time
When the double bladed axe slipped
And sank a wound so deep in her foot
That she felt her heart would not Jar loose from its frozen pause.

~~~~~

Copyright 2025 John Guzlowski

Tekla Hanczarek Guzlowski and her two children John and Donna in the United States circa 1956.

John Guzlowksi's poems about his parents' experiences as slave laborers in Nazi Germany appear in his award-winning Echoes of Tattered Tongues. His most recent books of poems are Mad Monk Ikkyu, True Confessions, and Small Talk: Writing about God and Writing and Me. His novels include Retreat: A Love Story and the Hank and Marvin mysteries.

---

Discover more from Vox Populi

Subscribe to get the latest posts sent to your email.

17 comments on "John Guzlowski: Two poems about my mother"

Marty Williams
December 11, 2025

The subject of these poems about his mother is difficult and compelling, and the precision searing. That pause!

Reply
Vox Populi
December 11, 2025

Yes.

>

Reply jzguzlowski
December 11, 2025

thanks, Marty. I miss talking to you.

Reply
Marty Williams
December 16, 2025

I miss hanging out with you, too, John, talking about poetry over coffee.

Reply

jmnewsome93c0e5f9cd

December 11, 2025

These two poems touch my life in many ways. Just a few thoughts:

how mothers handle grief and devastation... my mother hid her horrors till the wall she had built shattered.

Those young boys convinced of their godhood by the different crosses they wore...the crooked cross swastikas. The crooked cross now of christian nationalism.

My soul friend Etty Hillesum threw a letter through a slat as her trip on the cattle car from Westerbork Transit Camp in the Netherlands to Auschwitz began. Her final known words: We left the camp singing. I'm haunted by the cattle car chronicles we will never know. So much evil to stand against, it is sometimes overwhelming, and I just want to turn away to pour a cup of serenity. The Guzowski poems rebuild love and hope. But they also remind us of what history has produced, and is producing.

Reply

Vox Populi

December 11, 2025

What a beautiful post, Jim. Thank you.

>

Reply

Sean Sexton

December 11, 2025

Aye Jim: You've really said it. What a mess we find ourselves in, this point in our lives, and I once believed human culture, post Viet Nam would be progressing toward some kind of common realization of peace. It's gone quite the other way, presently Pell Mell!

Here's wishing you, all of us some vestige of solace. "Let all mortal flesh keep..."

Reply

jzguzlowski

December 11, 2025

thank you. When my mother found out I was writing poems about her experiences, she said I should tell people that she was not the only one who suffered, not the only one in the camps. I try to do that with every word I write about my mom and dad.

Reply

jmnewsome93c0e5f9cd

December 11, 2025

Thank you so much for keeping your mother's memory alive, and reminding us of what she and others faced. Peace to you tonight.

Reply

Vox Populi

December 12, 2025

You've done that task admirably.

>

Reply

boehmrosemary

December 11, 2025

Haunting poems. "And always a train of box cars / bleached to Baltic gray." And somehow I can't help but feeling they are for today.

Reply

Vox Populi

December 11, 2025

The parallels to today are frightening.

>

Reply

Bruce Morton

December 11, 2025

So well done.

Reply

Vox Populi

December 11, 2025

Aren't they, though?

>

Reply

Laure-Anne

December 11, 2025

I second Sean — such clarity in the grief of those memories and grief...

Reply

Sean Sexton

December 11, 2025

What superb poetry — so clear flowing, this stream of memory and word. A vivid accounting so lovely in the telling, even its harsh terms safely pass the heart.

Reply

Vox Populi

December 11, 2025

Exactly, Sean. Guz writes with such courage and precision. Even horrors are brought into the clear light.

>

Reply

This entry was posted on December 11, 2025 by Vox Populi in Health and Nutrition, Poetry, Social Justice, War and Peace and tagged antisemitism, Cattle Train to Magdeburg, Concentration camps, death camps, farm work, Fascism, genocide, How Her Mother and Sister Died, Jewish history, John Guzlowski, mothers and sons, Nazi, Poland, WWII.
<https://wp.me/p4xqzG-qLY>

Previous post

Next post

Blog at WordPress.com.